Seattle schools agree to accept $452,910 in damages from troubléd bus firm

By DARIA BALZER

Seattleschools were quick to make all the right moves after two years of tumultuous transportation, including a driver strike and significant injuries on the way home. But one issue remained: damages.

The Seattle School Board approved a damages settlement Wednesday evening.

The district will pay $452,910 to the family of John A. Brown, who died in a 2017 accident involving a bus company that failed to meet its obligations.

The agreement also extends the district's contract with First Student, whose three-year contract with First Student. The Seattle School Board approved the agreement unanimously.

For the second year in a row, the district still agreed to the terms of the agreement, according to Seattle schools spokesman.

The agreement also extended the district's contract with First Student, whose three-year contract with First Student ends in 2020.

The district agreed to extend the term of the contract for one year, with an option to renew for another year.

The settlement was reached after months of negotiations and mediation.

The Seattle School Board approved the agreement unanimously.

The district will pay $452,910 to the family of John A. Brown, who died in a 2017 accident involving a bus company that failed to meet its obligations.

The agreement also extends the district's contract with First Student, whose three-year contract with First Student ends in 2020.

The district agreed to extend the term of the contract for one year, with an option to renew for another year.

The settlement was reached after months of negotiations and mediation.

The Seattle School Board approved the agreement unanimously.

The district will pay $452,910 to the family of John A. Brown, who died in a 2017 accident involving a bus company that failed to meet its obligations.

The agreement also extends the district's contract with First Student, whose three-year contract with First Student ends in 2020.

The district agreed to extend the term of the contract for one year, with an option to renew for another year.

The settlement was reached after months of negotiations and mediation.

The Seattle School Board approved the agreement unanimously.

The district will pay $452,910 to the family of John A. Brown, who died in a 2017 accident involving a bus company that failed to meet its obligations.

The agreement also extends the district's contract with First Student, whose three-year contract with First Student ends in 2020.

The district agreed to extend the term of the contract for one year, with an option to renew for another year.

The settlement was reached after months of negotiations and mediation.

The Seattle School Board approved the agreement unanimously.