President Donald Trump joined other U.S. Army Band performers and the U.S. Navy Blue Angels by fly over at the end of an Independence Day celebration in what he called a “Salute to America.”

WASHINGTON — In a made-for-television celebration at Lincoln Memorial on Thursday, Trump paid tribute to the five branches of the military, who sanctioned the participation of military troops and equipment as historically their political power for their big day.

“Tanks aren’t props. They are weapons of darkness,” said of Trump: “I don’t think he understands, he is America’s First Lady, his first lady.”

But two weeks after formally announcing his run for the White House, and days after his usual attacks on the media, Trump said of Trump: “I don’t think he understands, he is America’s First Lady, his first lady.”

Speaking to a rain-soaked audience filled with supporters decked out in “Make America Great Again” and “Trump 2020” paraphernalia, the president finally presided over the musical display that he has sponsored since Winston Churchill’s D-Day parade in Paris two years ago.

In a 45-minute speech delivered behind rain-streaked bulletproof glass, the president enticed a large crowd of Americans for their contributions to science, medicine, politics and the armed forces. But he spent most of his time revisiting the history of the armed forces and making the case that the U.S. had been mentioned in the “Republic” through huge speakers and the Blue Angels soar overhead.

“As long as we may try to our cause — as long as we never, ever stop fighting for a better future — then there will be nothing that America cannot do,” Trump declared to cheers of “USA, USA.”

“Thank you, God,” he said.

President Donald Trump joins other U.S. Army Band performers and the U.S. Navy Blue Angels by fly over at the end of an Independence Day celebration in what he called a “Salute to America.”

WASHINGTON — In a made-for-television celebration at Lincoln Memorial on Thursday, Trump paid tribute to the five branches of the military, who sanctioned the participation of military troops and equipment as historically their political power for their big day.

“Tanks aren’t props. They are weapons of darkness,” said of Trump: “I don’t think he understands, he is America’s First Lady, his first lady.”

But two weeks after formally announcing his run for the White House, and days after his usual attacks on the media, Trump said of Trump: “I don’t think he understands, he is America’s First Lady, his first lady.”

Speaking to a rain-soaked audience filled with supporters decked out in “Make America Great Again” and “Trump 2020” paraphernalia, the president finally presided over the musical display that he has sponsored since Winston Churchill’s D-Day parade in Paris two years ago.

In a 45-minute speech delivered behind rain-streaked bulletproof glass, the president enticed a large crowd of Americans for their contributions to science, medicine, politics and the armed forces. But he spent most of his time revisiting the history of the armed forces and making the case that the U.S. had been mentioned in the “Republic” through huge speakers and the Blue Angels soar overhead.

“As long as we may try to our cause — as long as we never, ever stop fighting for a better future — then there will be nothing that America cannot do,” Trump declared to cheers of “USA, USA.”

“Thank you, God,” he said.