Olympia struggles with #MeToo
THE RECKONING

Staffers frustrated without neutral place to report harassment

BY MATT DAVIS

Staff writers, lobbyists and members of the Legislature complained in recent weeks that the Capitol lacks a neutral place for sexual harassment complaints, a problem that has plagued the statehouse for decades.

One avenue for staff to report harassment is a hotline. But the program, which is run by the Capitol's Fiscal Management Board, is not perfect. The board does not have a designated place for it, and the Capitol's Office of Security does not have a designated place for it.

The board has a policy that encourages employees to report harassment to their managers, or to the Capitol's Office of Security. But the board's policy is not effective, and the Capitol's Office of Security has not been effective.

The board has a policy that encourages employees to report harassment to their managers, or to the Capitol's Office of Security. But the board's policy is not effective, and the Capitol's Office of Security has not been effective.

One avenue for staff to report harassment is a hotline. But the program, which is run by the Capitol's Fiscal Management Board, is not perfect. The board does not have a designated place for it, and the Capitol's Office of Security does not have a designated place for it.

The board has a policy that encourages employees to report harassment to their managers, or to the Capitol's Office of Security. But the board's policy is not effective, and the Capitol's Office of Security has not been effective.

The board has a policy that encourages employees to report harassment to their managers, or to the Capitol's Office of Security. But the board's policy is not effective, and the Capitol's Office of Security has not been effective.

One avenue for staff to report harassment is a hotline. But the program, which is run by the Capitol's Fiscal Management Board, is not perfect. The board does not have a designated place for it, and the Capitol's Office of Security does not have a designated place for it.

The board has a policy that encourages employees to report harassment to their managers, or to the Capitol's Office of Security. But the board's policy is not effective, and the Capitol's Office of Security has not been effective.

The board has a policy that encourages employees to report harassment to their managers, or to the Capitol's Office of Security. But the board's policy is not effective, and the Capitol's Office of Security has not been effective.

One avenue for staff to report harassment is a hotline. But the program, which is run by the Capitol's Fiscal Management Board, is not perfect. The board does not have a designated place for it, and the Capitol's Office of Security does not have a designated place for it.

The board has a policy that encourages employees to report harassment to their managers, or to the Capitol's Office of Security. But the board's policy is not effective, and the Capitol's Office of Security has not been effective.