President vents about Mueller in tweet storm

Accuses investigators of being partisan in Russian probe
Republicans worry frustrated Trump will fire special counsel

By PETER BAHR June 16, 2018
WASHINGTON — President Donald Trump on Sunday abandoned a strategy of choosing deference to the special counsel examining Russian interference once in the 2016 presidential election, lashing out at what he called “bipartisan attacks” that had been launched by the justices of his administration.

Trump has long suggested that allegations that he or his campaign conspired with Russia to influence the election are a "hoax" and part of "witch hunt," but that charge was buttressed by the release of emails that highlighted the status of lawyers who had not directly acted on Robert Mu­ller’s request for hours of interrogation by the FBI.

"Why does the Mueller team have 17 chartered planes flying around comforting friends of Hillary Clinton while we go out and buy phones for soldiers in Afghanistan who have no plane at all?"

The attack on Mueller, a longtime Republican, and the FBI director appointed by a Republican president, George W. Bush, drew condemnations from some members of the GOP, although it was not immediately clear whether the president himself was signaling an effort to fire the special counsel, whom he traditionally claimed to have utmost respect for.
