In the wake of Hurricane Michael, residents in the Florida Panhandle face frustration and fear that has afflicted much of the region. The New York Times

By RICHARD FAUSSET, ALAN RICHARDSON, ALEX BELO

Parked next to the Lake Union Park bridge are soggy fuel tanks, the first evidence of a massive energy crisis that is gripping the region. A wildfire smoldering in the distance, and another burning nearby, are also evidence of the challenge.

Darla Cray coral at MadArt Studio on

The first evidence of a massive energy crisis that is gripping the region. A wildfire smoldering in the distance, and another burning nearby, are also evidence of the challenge.

The storm had ripped off large sections of his roof. The food had spoiled in his refrigerator. The storm had knocked out power, plumbing, and electricity.

The storm had knocked out power, plumbing, and electricity.

C'mon, Facebook, is now a good time to unveil a camera? PERSONAL TECH > A9

No way to even ask for help: Florida residents desperate for food and shelter

The New York Times

BY NICK MIROFF, JOSH DAWSEY

WASHINGTON — The Trump administration is preparing to separate more than 500 parents and children in the U.S.-Mexico border, hoping to reverse growing numbers of families attempting to cross illegally into the United States, according to several administration officials with knowledge of the effort. One option under considera- tion is to house the children with family members in the United States, according to one official who spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan was not yet public.

AURORA, Colo. — As the Trump administration plans to separate thousands of families crossing into the United States this summer to pressure the Mexican government tostem the flow of migrants, the administration is expected to deport more than 150,000 people and detain more than 200,000 people.

The Trump administration is preparing to separate more than 500 parents and children in the U.S.-Mexico border, hoping to reverse growing numbers of families attempting to cross illegally into the United States, according to several administration officials with knowledge of the effort. One option under considera- tion is to house the children with family members in the United States, according to one official who spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan was not yet public.

As the Trump administration plans to separate thousands of families crossing into the United States this summer to pressure the Mexican government tostem the flow of migrants, the administration is expected to deport more than 150,000 people and detain more than 200,000 people.

C'mon, Facebook, is now a good time to unveil a camera? PERSONAL TECH > A9

The first evidence of a massive energy crisis that is gripping the region. A wildfire smoldering in the distance, and another burning nearby, are also evidence of the challenge.

The storm had knocked out power, plumbing, and electricity.

C'mon, Facebook, is now a good time to unveil a camera? PERSONAL TECH > A9

No way to even ask for help: Florida residents desperate for food and shelter

The New York Times

BY NICK MIROFF, JOSH DAWSEY

WASHINGTON — The Trump administration is preparing to separate more than 500 parents and children in the U.S.-Mexico border, hoping to reverse growing numbers of families attempting to cross illegally into the United States, according to several administration officials with knowledge of the effort. One option under considera- tion is to house the children with family members in the United States, according to one official who spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan was not yet public.

AURORA, Colo. — As the Trump administration plans to separate thousands of families crossing into the United States this summer to pressure the Mexican government tostem the flow of migrants, the administration is expected to deport more than 150,000 people and detain more than 200,000 people.

The Trump administration is preparing to separate more than 500 parents and children in the U.S.-Mexico border, hoping to reverse growing numbers of families attempting to cross illegally into the United States, according to several administration officials with knowledge of the effort. One option under considera- tion is to house the children with family members in the United States, according to one official who spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan was not yet public.

As the Trump administration plans to separate thousands of families crossing into the United States this summer to pressure the Mexican government tostem the flow of migrants, the administration is expected to deport more than 150,000 people and detain more than 200,000 people.

C'mon, Facebook, is now a good time to unveil a camera? PERSONAL TECH > A9

No way to even ask for help: Florida residents desperate for food and shelter

The New York Times

BY NICK MIROFF, JOSH DAWSEY

WASHINGTON — The Trump administration is preparing to separate more than 500 parents and children in the U.S.-Mexico border, hoping to reverse growing numbers of families attempting to cross illegally into the United States, according to several administration officials with knowledge of the effort. One option under considera- tion is to house the children with family members in the United States, according to one official who spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan was not yet public.

AURORA, Colo. — As the Trump administration plans to separate thousands of families crossing into the United States this summer to pressure the Mexican government tostem the flow of migrants, the administration is expected to deport more than 150,000 people and detain more than 200,000 people.

The Trump administration is preparing to separate more than 500 parents and children in the U.S.-Mexico border, hoping to reverse growing numbers of families attempting to cross illegally into the United States, according to several administration officials with knowledge of the effort. One option under considera- tion is to house the children with family members in the United States, according to one official who spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan was not yet public.