Insome cases, the government has not provided medical care for those in custody. This made it more difficult for individuals to care for their physical needs while in detention. The situation in detention facilities has been widely criticized, and the government has faced increasing pressure to improve conditions.

Kevin K. McAleenan, who ran the Department of Homeland Security's Customs and Border Protection, has been criticized for breaking a campaign promise to improve conditions in detention facilities. McAleenan acknowledged that conditions had worsened under his leadership, despite promises to improve them.

The administration has faced criticism for its aggressive immigration policies, which have resulted in record numbers of deportations and separations. The government has been accused of using immigration as a tool to control public opinion and to advance its political agenda.

In some cases, the government has faced legal challenges to its immigration policies. These challenges have been brought by advocacy groups and individuals who have been affected by the policies. The government has been forced to defend its actions in court, and these challenges have placed additional strain on the agency.

The government has also been criticized for its treatment of individuals who are detained. These individuals have been held in overcrowded conditions and have been denied access to medical care. The government has been forced to defend its actions in court, and these challenges have placed additional strain on the agency.